However, much of the current provisioning model is based upon antiquated hardware, which is ill-suited to provide a consistent, consistent, and efficient service to the company's customers and their needs. In order to meet the increasing demand for customer service, companies have turned to a shift to virtual storefronts. However, current infrastructure may not support the provisioning for a large number of customers at the same time or on a consistent basis. Most e-commerce or internet websites are composed of multiple steps, each of which is usually performed by a separate application. For example, a website may first receive a customer order at a web page. The customer order information is transferred to a database for storage. Subsequently, a stock keeping unit (SKU) may retrieve the orders of a particular item from the database. The SKU may prepare the ordered item and ship it to the customer on behalf of the company. In all of the aforementioned examples, there are applications that perform operations on the respective web pages, databases, and/or SKUs that are conducted in the background while a customer uses the company's website. Consequently, although a customer can browse through a company's website, the customer may not be able to place an order while the background operations are being conducted. However, the manner in which customers operate an e-commerce website can have a substantial impact on the number of orders generated by the website. For example, heavy use of a shopping cart by one customer may overload the SKUs thereby prompting the company's system administrator to turn off the shopping cart feature on the website. Such disabled cart feature may cause the customer to abandon the website and shop elsewhere. Therefore, there is a 04aeff104c
