One-hundred-and-twenty crossbred preruminant calves were used to study the effects of dietary milk fat on the feeding behavior and energy metabolism of calves. The calves were divided into six groups and fed one of six different milk fat diets containing 1.2, 1.8, 2.4, 3.0, 3.6 and 4.0% milk fat respectively, for a period of 6 weeks. Body weight of the calves increased from the first week to the third week on the experimental diets and from the third week to the sixth week of the experiment. There was no difference in growth rate between the groups. The food conversion rate decreased with increasing fat level of the milk. Maximum feed intake was recorded at the end of third week of the experiment when the diets contained 3.0 and 3.6% milk fat. This was due to the change in rumen fermentation pattern from predominantly acidogenic to predominantly protozoal fermentation. The total daily heat production and the apparent digestible energy intake per calf was not affected by the fat level of the milk. However, a decrease in the feed conversion ratio was recorded during the last 2 weeks of the experiment, which was associated with an increase in milk fat level.Subcellular localization and function of a putative calcium-binding protein from the Mediterranean red alga Cyanopsis japonica and its constitutive overexpression in Aspergillus oryzae.
