Estimation of the parameters of a nonlinear stochastic signal-sampling model for measured data obtained from an optically bistable ferroelectric liquid-crystal display. An analysis of the output signal of a real ferroelectric liquid-crystal display can be characterized by nonlinear stochastic signal-sampling theory. To model the complicated dynamics of the displayed patterns, a phenomenological model is proposed using nonlinear functions of both physical parameters and the sample number of signal sampling. Using a computer simulation method, we investigate the validity of the model and compare it with the real system, whose electrical behavior has been characterized by a hybrid system of a ferroelectric liquid-crystal display and a computer. The influence of the electrode structure on the response delay and the contrast ratio of the displayed patterns are investigated. An analysis of the output signal of the real system is carried out, and the stochastic model is verified by comparing the results of the real system with the simulated ones. Polymorphism of gap junction plaques in the pyramidal cells of the rat hippocampal slices revealed by Connexin36-specific antibody. In vitro slice cultures provide an excellent tool to study physiological properties of subcellular structures during longer time periods than whole-animal tissue. We have observed that gap junction plaques in the distal dendrites of rat CA1 pyramidal neurons in slice cultures have a different morphology from that in acute slices of hippocampus. In acute hippocampal slices Connexin36-containing gap junctions were found in dendritic soma, whereas in slice culture only small globular plaques were detected in the proximal dendrites of CA1. The causes of the observed difference in the plaque structure and their physiological implication were investigated using antibodies against specific connexin. By immunohistochemistry on serial sections, we found that the Connexin36-specific antibody identified the gap junctions containing Connexin36 but not the Connexin43-containing ones. In the distal dendrites of the whole-cell patched CA1 pyramidal cells in slice culture, the cell-wide gap junctions revealed by a Connexin36-specific antibody, but not the smaller ones, were transiently opened during depolarization and in response to a K(+) challenge.
