This release also features the new Adjustment layers in CS6. Photoshop users can now create and edit gradient maps in addition to adding fills and strokes to objects. The Adjustment layers section also includes a new Layer Mask panel to select which adjustments will be applied to the selected object. Adobe Photoshop continues to support the 16-bit TIFF format and the new 32-bit JPEGXR format, along with Adobe's new High Efficiency compression format options. In conjunction with this update, Adobe introduced the newest version of Photoshop CC, available later this year. This new update includes a number of exciting new features to help photographers unlock the power of Adobe Photoshop for their production workflow. The new features will allow photographers to optimize their workflows by easily sharing Photoshop layers between projects, working with image adjustment layers as normal images, and combining both images and adjustment layers to create one seamless image. Also included is scene-based workflow support for photographers on the go, and improved support for photographers with Retina displays. Every Photoshop design comes with a master page. It is a canvas of sorts which contains the previous designs and sub artboards. Once the design is approved by you, it goes back to an artboard and then to the drawing board. This way you can minimise the risk of losing any of the important design choices you have made. The main advantage of having an artboard is that you can easily create multiple copies of your artboards and place them on different pages of a website. So, say you are designing a logo for your company, and you make one artboard for every logo that your company will use in a year. Even before you have the chance to preview the design, you can move the artboards to different pages of your website to test their appearance. You can also easily scale and align the artboards. Moreover, it allows you to insert images precisely.
